

Wilson's VMT students attend the Annual Midwest Veterinary Conference

Enhancing the Wilson College Student Educational Experience

The education of future leaders is important for our society today. Students learn a great deal from Wilson's dedicated faculty, but a well-rounded education sometimes involves opportunities beyond the classroom. In 2015, proceeds from the Golf Classic were used to allow Professor Tammy Ege, instructor of veterinary medical technology, and 19 VMT Clinical Experience students to spend a day at the Maryland Zoo. In the classroom, the students get to have hands-on experience with cats, dogs, pocket pets and farm animals, but they do not learn about zoo animals. "I enjoy watching them realize that what they did learn about a species in one of our classes can usually be applied to a zoo animal," said Ege. "For example, what they learned about a horse can be applied to a zebra."

Additionally, funds allowed 10 senior VMT students to attend the Midwest Veterinary Conference in Ohio. It was a jam-packed, three days of learning through a variety of educational sessions and expert speakers. "It's really awesome to be able to network with professionals in the field," said Danielle Boock '16. "The educational benefits gained from this conference helped me feel even more prepared for my career after graduation."

Aided by small class sizes and well-qualified Wilson faculty, such field-based and hands-on experiential learning provides our students with a unique set of educational and research experiences.
